Not illustrated.1824 Excerpt: ... lies in his power, how much soever it may be to the detriment of others, whom he considers as so many cyphers in the creation, and himself as the only significant figure. It is this excessive pride, this unreasonable self-love, that excites in the mind of man, all those motions and agitations that hurry him to tyranny, oppression, fraud, rapine, cruelty, and almost every other mischievous and detestable vice: so that, wherever this passion rules, she governs with an imperious sway, and is surrounded with a numerous retinue composed of every ill. From this it is plain, that a wise and virtuous man can never be proud; nor can he be exalted in his thoughts at any advantages he has above others; because he is conscious of his own weakness and inability to become either wise or virtuous by any thing he finds in his own power; and his sense of the goodness of the bountiful God in bestowing upon him more abundantly, what he has been pleased more sparingly to vouchsafe to others, will inspire his soul with humility, thankfulness and adoration: besides he will reflect how unworthy he would be of so glorious a distinction, and of so unvaluable, as well as undeserved a preference to other men, if he could be capable of acting so as to seem to attribute any part of it to himself; and how just it would be in that adorable Being to deprive him of those blessings his bounty alone hath conferred upon him, and to degrade him to the lowest rank of human nature. But no reasonable man can think himself able to acquire and preserve wisdom by his own strength, when he knows that either a blow or disease is capable of making an idiot of him; and thus, finding himself too weak to preserve it, his reason will readily demonstrate to him, that he wants force to acquire it. But, on th...
