Much of the history, and some of the law, perhaps, contained in the writings ascribed to Moses, came down to those who quote them, by traditions of uncertain original, though they were all alike ascribed by the Jews, to the same legislator. p. 340, If the Pentateuch was public before the time of David, it does not follow, that Moses was the author of it... time enough between them to make fabulous traditions pass for authentic history. P. 343. The whole history of the Old Testament sounded on incredible anecdotes, consists of little else. p. 344. When we speak of the Pentateuch, as of an authentic history, and quote Moses as solemnly as Don Quixote did Turpin, are we much less mad than he was? When I sit down to read this history... I am ready to think myself transported into a sort of fairy land, where every thing is done by magic and enchantment. p. 350. The Jews deserve, on many accounts, to be trusted the least... it is improbable their history should have been written, and impossible impossible that it should have been preserved, with a strict regard to truth. The law of the Jews produced a legal in-p. 357. justice and cruelty to others. Jacobs vow, Gen. 28. most impiously p. 358. interested and craving.
