

Field Notes: A Geography of Mourning

Mourning finds cadence in the natural world. The ebb and flow of grief-at once disorienting and reassuring-form the landscape of Sharon Whites exquisitely written memoir of loss and eventual renewal. Field Notes is Whites map back to finding herself following the untimely death of her young husband. She rediscovers her bearings amid the everyday drama of nature-the shadowy company of a moose, an unbridled chorus of crows, the persistence of a young family of raccoons. These animals cheer me, so determined and knowing as they go from one task to another. A map of the territory in their animal brains. They know what theyre here for, she observes. After Steves death, I lost that sense of orientation. I wasnt sure anymore who I was. Her journey through loss will resonate with individuals experiencing grief, providing inspiration and reassurance along the way. Features: an honest and deeply personal account of one womans life after loss gracefully covers difficult emotional territory: memories, longing, anger, hope elegant prose offers gentle guidance and solace
